UNICEF UK has used our network of interim managers on multiple occasions across their fundraising team.

THINK are quick to respond to briefs, good to work with and always provide someone more than qualified to undertake the job or project. Our experience has been that typically a THINK interim fits into the organisation quickly, getting up to speed with the culture and tasks ahead, allowing them to hit the ground running and start delivering on the key objectives.'

How we work with you

Careful selection:

Our mission is to find you a THINK Interim manager who is exactly right for the job and your organisation. We start by delving into your brief and job description and discussing what you need before we match you with candidates. We then offer you a selection of CVs to review and interview.

Ongoing support:

Once a THINK Interim manager is in place, we keep in regular touch to make sure you are happy with their progress. We support managers we place throughout their assignment, on a frequent basis.

Leave the learning behind:

Your THINK Interim manager works on site with your team and builds an effective working relationship with all staff involved in the project. Our managers are committed to sharing their knowledge so that when the time comes to leave, the learning stays within your organisation.

We pay managers directly:

Our managers are paid directly by us, so you don't have to put them on your payroll.

Part time often works best:

Many organisations find that employing a THINK Interim manager part time gives them greater flexibility. It also allows the manager to focus on priorities, rather than getting caught up in meetings and activities that aren't central to their role.
